TUGBOAT

State officials had earlier hoped to make Smith pay a total of $54,292 in cleanup costs and related charges.

In court earlier this week, Stan Glisson, Smith's attorney, raised questions over apparent incomplete and confusing billing statements that had been submitted by Global Diving & Salvage, the Seattle company hired to raise the Chickamauga and dispose of the vessel.

Glisson also claimed that restitution should be limited because there wasn't a "victim" in the sinking of the vessel, and also argued that Smith wasn't the actual owner of the old tugboat.

Instead, Glisson said, the owner of the Chickamauga when it sank was actually Smith's ex-wife, who received the tugboat in their divorce settlement years before.

He also questioned whether Smith should be on the hook for paying for the vessel to be towed to Port Townsend, plus the costs of storing the ship there and then its dismantling.

Smith's restitution costs should end at the point the tugboat was raised from the bottom of the harbor, he said.

From the time the ship is up and floating again, Glisson said, the costs should be "out of Mr. Smith's hands."

Assistant State Attorney General Joshua Choate disagreed about the lack of a victim in the case.

"The taxpayers are really the victim here," Choate said.

The vessel sank in state waters, he said, and Choate added that there was no doubt that Smith was the actual owner of the boat.

It was Smith who brought the old tug to Bainbridge Island from Ballard, Choate recalled, and it was also Smith who filled out an application to moor the vessel in Eagle Harbor and then "ditched it" at the Eagle Harbor Marina.

"Mr. Smith was in control of the boat, he was the owner of the boat," Choate said.

What's more, in Smith's divorce with his wife, he actually agreed to sell the vessel and share the proceeds with

More HORSE power for renewable energy on Bainbridge

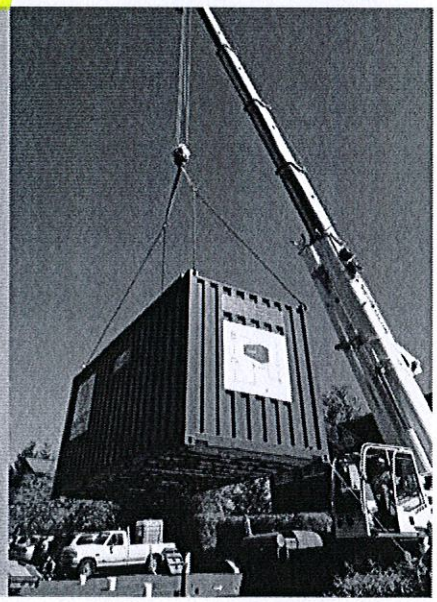

Bainbridge Island's commitment to sustainability just got some real giddy-up.

For the next six months, the Harbour Public House restaurant will test out a new biodigester called the HORSE—short for High solids Organic waste Recycling System with Electrical output. It converts food waste into nutrient-rich fertilizer for use on the island and electricity for the restaurant. The clean, odorless system boosts renewable energy while reducing the island's waste stream.

Seattle-based project partner Impact Bioenergy manufactures the HORSE. PSE proudly sponsors the leasing expenses, hoping the pilot program will facilitate discussions about the larger potential for this technology on Bainbridge.
